NEWS OF THE WEEK.

(From the Spectator, February 21.)
Its great debate has been prolonged throughest the week, without any material variation in the nature of the arguments advanced on a side. Among the mass of speeches, the parall run present little for notice; but three was stikingly remarkable—those of the Presist. Mr. Bright, and Lord John Manners.

Is is palpable success on all hands, Sir Robert Peel speech has far exceeded all his previous storts. It must be impossible, even for the wont bigoted Protectionist, to hear or read that speech and retain the shadow of a notion that the Corn-laws could be maintained in the unth of the Irish scarcity, and of the altered spines in England; or that Sir Robert Peel also set in perfect good faith. He may be said to have risked all which he has valued as a public man—political power, reputation some and castigations, wandered from the squeent, or eared for any triumph but that of the cause.

Mr. Bright was remarkable as the most proment member of the League who has spoken in the debate. He was also remarkable for the unqualified tone in which he eulogized the good of Monday—the greatest, he sand, defeed in that House within the memory of anythere; he envied Sir Robert L'eel his feeling after uttering it. Bravo, John Bright! sans credit is due to the man who thus embadically relinquishes old prejudices, and just a standing subject for the easy eloques of disgaragement.

Breybody expected that Lord John Manman would be unable to keep up the amusing strake of the letter to the electors of Newark, a which he told them that, being in favour of the maintaining it; but his speech has disappinted that expectation. Entomologists tell shat the butterfly whom you cannot hit with shation, for he keeps to no one course. Once he was a Protectionist; but you could not easie him, for while you aimed he was off on the Usprotectionist fack, then back again—affiling protection, but about to vote for it: see he does not like abolishing it, but he is stafmid of it; so he votes against considering the subject, and wishes the Premier "to have does not like abolishing it, but he is at sfraid of it; so he votes against considering the subject, and wishes the Premier 'to opel to the country.' Meanwhile, he has measured us that when that appeal comes about, he will vote no more for protection.

On the whole, however, the Protectionists hereast shown so ill in the monster debate as subject per common that appeal comes as subject per common to the strength of the country.' Meanwhile, he has seen the work of the country.' Meanwhile, he has seen the work of the country.' Meanwhile, he has seen the country.' Meanwhile, he has substituted for the potato: to meet the substitute of root never the cheap fort, the price cought to be far below the verage level—as near as possible to the spiralest of a potato price. The Protectionists appears that the change is in his opinion as to the abstent merits of free trade—everybody knows that the change is in his opinion as to the abstent merits of free trade—everybody knows that the change is possible and included. The country of the country, the many individual changes—another great fair free trade now is practicable and included. The country of the country.' Merit he change is possible to the spiralest of a potato price. The Protectionists appears the substitute of the country of the country.' In the country of the c mose elese could be minister; and if free make heavisable, it must be carried by the missers de facto. Mr. Bright makes an ispaious distinction; he points out that Bir Robert Peel ceased to be the Protectionist leader when he resigned office—that set closed his career as the minister of 1841: he re-entered office, at the appointment of the Crown, on another mission and on mother footing. But, asy the objectors, driven miss comer, he ought at least "to appeal to the country." There is a show of fairness in the complaint; yet even here there lurks more than one taint of rottenness. The appeal is the less necessary, as Mr. Milner Gibbon remarkd, in that the present Parliament was specially elected to consider the question of protection. The agricultural constituencies to specially present by their representatives; and having sat in deliberation for four or five year, they have come to the conclusion that protection ought to be abolished. It is true list many of the members were sent to Parliament with an opposite prejudice; but we see hersult. What is tile use of putting the membranesies to the trouble of sending more representatives, to undergo a more rapid research of the same process of conversion? Way, the conversion is now going on among the constituencies to the trouble of sending more representatives, to undergo a more rapid research of the same process of conversion? Way, the conversion is now going on among the constituencies to the trouble of sending more representatives, to undergo a more rapid research to the same the same the sending structure is now the change in the sending structure is now going on among the constituencies the same to the constituencies the sending structure and the constituencies are not the years of the country? He can only appeal to the sendituencies; and the constituencies are not "the people. The selectors is all in all to the labourer. Yet he speal would be made to the people.
